The authors conclude that "the Natal-Kew link had not only served to present to the British public a positive aspect of a troublesome colony, but it had also inspired Natalians to take a pride in their garden colony."